Centennial Place at Georgia Southern University Opens, Unveiling the Shape of Things to Come

Another Successful Hardin Higher Education Project

STATESBORO, GA – October 15, 2009 – With a snip of the scissors against a background of cheers, Georgia Southern University today officially opened Centennial Place—a four-building, residential complex that university officials are calling “a model for the future.”

Completed in August 2009—on time and on budget—the $46 million facility encompasses 375,000 square feet and houses 1,001 students. The new complex replaces three traditional residence halls and offers Georgia Southern students five housing options—from two-bedroom units to super-suites that feature individual bedrooms and shared living and kitchen spaces—as well as retail space, a food court, recreational areas, a computer lab and related student services.

“Centennial Place is a great addition to Georgia Southern's housing stock,” said University Housing Director Vickie Hawkins. “Residence hall students are very pleased and satisfied with the building and all of the amenities it offers. I have appreciated the strong and cooperative working relationship with Hardin Construction throughout the construction process.”
